Sommario/riassunto

This book explores the various pathways for ecological transition, focusing on the adaptation and mitigation strategies necessary to address climate change at both national and territorial levels in Europe and France. It emphasizes the importance of strategic planning and dynamic management of territories to achieve sustainable, carbon-neutral, and resilient environments. The book details practical approaches and case studies, including adaptation pathways and low-carbon reference trajectories specific to French territories, such as Dunkerque and Corsica. It advocates for coordinated actions among public and private stakeholders to foster ecological transition, highlighting the critical role of urban planning and policy integration. The intended audience includes policymakers, urban planners, environmental scientists, and anyone interested in ecological transition and sustainable development.
