| Sommario/riassunto | This book by Bénédicte Laumond examines the challenges faced by Germany in combating right-wing extremism, particularly in light of the discovery of the National Socialist Underground (NSU) terrorist cell responsible for a series of racially motivated murders from 2000 to 2007. The author provides a comprehensive overview of contemporary German policing and surveillance strategies against right-wing extremism, analyzing the effectiveness of security institutions. The study is based on empirical data collected from local and federal actors involved in these efforts across Germany, including Berlin, Saxony, Brandenburg, and Dortmund. Laumond, a doctoral candidate in political science, aims to shed light on the complex relationship between the state, security forces, and right-wing extremist groups in Germany. The book is intended for readers interested in political extremism and security policy, offering insights into the German experience amidst broader European and global contexts. |
