Sommario/riassunto	The Children's Legal Rights Journal is a quarterly legal journal, edited by Loyola students in conjunction with the American Bar Association Center on Children and the Law and with the cooperation of the National Association of Counsel for Children. The CLRJ focuses on the broad range of legal issues confronting children. Its goal is to provide practitioners in law and related fields with the practical resources they need to be effective advocates for their child clients. The CLRJ encourages interdisciplinary submissions as well as more traditional law-related articles.-- It is a national publication intended for an interdisciplinary audience, including attorneys, social workers, educators, health professionals, policy makers, academics and child advocates. Loyola J.D. and LL.M. students edit the Journal in collaboration with the ABA Center on Children and the Law. The Journal also serves as the membership publication of the National Association of Counsel for Children. The Journal also hosts an annual symposium on a topic of significance to child and family law stakeholders. Coverage - From Spring 2013 through current
