| Sommario/riassunto             | Cyberstalking is a disturbing reality for many in the United States andacross the world. Yet, little is known about the extent or nature ofcyberstalking victimization. Reyns's intent is to estimate the extent ofvictimization, and by utilizing the lifestyle-routine activities perspectiveto identify risk factors for cyberstalking victimization among collegestudents. Results indicate that certain online behaviors such as onlinesocial network usage, friending strangers online, engaging in onlineforms of deviance, and possessing a propensity toward low self-controlincrease one's likelihood |
