

1. Record Nr.	UNINA9910715076503321
Autore	Hope Gregory C.
Titolo	"Army training, sir" : the impact of the World War I experience on the evolution of training doctrine in the US Army // Gregory C. Hope
Pubbl/distr/stampa	Fort Leavenworth, Kansas : , : Army University Press, , 2021
Descrizione fisica	1 online resource (xiii, 111 pages)
Collana	Art of war papers
Disciplina	355.50973
Soggetti	Military education - United States - History - 20th century World War, 1914-1918 - Influence Influence (Literary, artistic, etc.) Military education Parliamentary practice History United States
Lingua di pubblicazione	Inglese
Formato	Materiale a stampa
Livello bibliografico	Monografia
Note generali	"February 2021"--Title page verso. "A US Army Command and General Staff College Press book."
Nota di bibliografia	Includes bibliographical references.
Sommario/riassunto	"The American Army's mobilization for World War I was fraught with difficulties, resulting in a number of failings that produced a capable but flawed expeditionary force. The traditional interpretation of army training during that conflict was lackluster as it produced combat units that lacked critical capabilities. The experience of learning how to train and how to write training doctrine produced positive results that have been largely overlooked by historians. This study examines the status of training in the pre-war army, to include both existing doctrine and institutional management organizations. It then chronicles the wartime experience and traces the evolution of training doctrine and practices during the war. It concludes by looking at the immediate post-war years to determine what lasting impacts the wartime experiences had on training doctrine and management. Overall, this study concludes that the training effort during World War I had significant long-term benefits for the army, producing the foundation of the army's training practices through World War II"--
