Sommario/riassunto

This edited volume, 'Decolonial Horizons: Reshaping Synodality, Mission, and Social Justice,' explores the intersections of decolonial theology, synodality, and social justice within the context of ecumenical and interfaith dialogue. It brings together diverse perspectives on decolonizing religious practices and theological concepts to address issues of power, identity, and inclusion. The book is divided into four parts, discussing topics such as decolonial ecclesiology, reimagining family and gender roles, decolonizing mission history, and public policy. Through contributions from various scholars, it aims to provide insights into advancing the ecumenical cause by engaging marginalized voices and fostering dialogue across different faiths. The intended audience includes scholars, theologians, and students interested in decolonial studies, theology, and interfaith relations.
