Sommario/riassunto	This text draws upon original research into women's workplace protest to deliver a new account of working-class women's political identity and participation in post-war England. Focusing on the voices and experiences of women who fought for equal pay, skill recognition, and the right to work between 1968 and 1985, it explores why working- class women engaged in such action when they did, and it analyses the impact of workplace protest on women's political identity.
