Sommario/riassunto	Née dans l'océan ancestral il y a plus de 3,8 milliards d'années, quand les premières cellules se sont clonées par scissiparité, la vie s'est ensuite diversifiée avant d'exploser sur les continents. Bien plus qu'un simple inventaire d'espèces élaboré depuis plusieurs siècles, la biodiversité se définit comme l'ensemble des relations entre les êtres vivants et leur environnement : c'est la fraction vivante de la nature. Elle est actuellement très menacée par la croissance démographique et l'urbanisation, la destruction et la contamination des milieux naturels, la surexploitation des ressources, l'introduction anarchique d'espèces et le réchauffement climatique. Saurons-nous, au XXIe siècle, mettre fin à cette crise écologique sans précédent ?

Sommario/riassunto	"A very fine and forensic piece of scholarship which sheds a fascinating light on the linkage between internal rural-urban migration and the access to and experience of health care in China. Highly recommended." Colin Hay, Professor of Political Science, Sciences Po, Paris This book focuses on the multifaceted reality of social and health constraints and health services access among migrants in China, by originally exploring the social strata, social networks, and the understanding of health and health services among migrants. Furthermore, this book investigates the health constraints and health services access of rural-urban migrants in the absence of equal social protection by the government. It argues that the main obstacles to access health services are not only the shortage of financial resources among rural-urban migrants, but also lie in the institutional blindness regarding health security provision, rural-urban dualism and the household registration system in China. The book highlights the key function that social networks play in health and health services access among migrants in China, which has rarely been discussed in previous studies. And it also discusses the understanding of health among migrants, and further analyses that although many migrants have not formed proper understanding of the connotation of health and have limited knowledge of health, prime responsibility should not be put on the migrants because their poor understanding of health mainly results from their rural perspective while health and health services access depend on the social-economic environment in which they live and work. This book would be of interest to people in migration studies, social exclusion and social welfare studies and to people interested in rural-urban migration and health in China.
