Sommario/riassunto	This book explores the access to healthcare service during a global pandemic by rural ethnic women of Bangladesh. The authors consider different dimensions of accessibility such as- physical access, financial access, health behaviour and different socio-cultural factors of access, and attempts to explore the degree of access to healthcare of rural ethnic women from Santal tribe in Bangladesh during the COVID-19 pandemic. This exploration is likely to be helpful for healthcare providing organizations, international donor agencies, policy makers, and future researchers of gender studies, social policy, development studies among other fields. Faraha Nawaz is a Professor at the University of Rajshahi, Bangladesh. A.N. Bushra has completed her bachelors and masters (thesis) degree in Public administration from the University of Rajshahi, Bangladesh.
