Sommario/riassunto	Modern societies are increasingly formed by social, economic and legal relations that dissolve the traditional boundaries of nation states. Transnational firms and other cross-border organizations and networks develop new modes of cooperation, thereby setting new standards of governance. At the same time, markets - in particular financial markets - have more and more outgrown systems of national regulation, and time and again a crisis illustrates the need to improve international policy coordination, and to develop more elaborate ways of coping with the risks that arise.
