Sommario/riassunto	This book explores the complex process of community formation in Argentina, focusing on the social, economic, political, and cultural factors that contribute to a sense of belonging and collective identity. It examines historical narratives and shared experiences within factories, neighborhoods, and towns, highlighting the roles of various social actors, both native and immigrant. The book delves into the construction of communities through shared interests, past struggles, disappointments, and cultural symbols, using diverse historical methodologies to analyze these common pasts. It invites readers to critically reflect on local history and the lived experiences stored in various documents and artifacts. The intended audience includes scholars and students of history, sociology, and cultural studies, as well as those interested in community dynamics and urban studies.
