Sommario/riassunto

This book, edited by Prof. Dr. Bernhard Pfister and authored by Erwin Müller, provides an in-depth analysis of the integration of German expellees into the economic and social fabric of Baden-Württemberg after World War II. It discusses the demographic distribution, resettlement processes, and socio-economic conditions of the displaced populations. The study utilizes data from post-war censuses and government reports to assess the challenges and progress in integrating these expellees into various sectors, including agriculture, industry, and public housing. The book aims to offer insights into the complexities of post-war reconstruction and the role of government and societal efforts in addressing the expellee issue. It is primarily intended for scholars and policymakers interested in post-war European migration and integration policies.

Sommario/riassunto

There is a saying in Brazil: “Mosquitoes are democratic: they bite the rich and the poor alike.” Why then is bad health---from violence to respiratory disease, from malaria to dengue---dispersed unevenly across different social and national groups? In Living and Dying in São Paulo, Jeffrey Lesser focuses on the Bom Retiro neighborhood to explore such questions by examining the competing visions of well-being in Brazil among racialized immigrants and policymakers and health officials. He analyzes the fraught relationship between Bom Retiro residents and the state and health care agencies that have overseen community sanitation efforts since the mid-nineteenth century, drawing out the connected systems of the built environment, public health laws and practices, and citizenship. Lesser employs the concept of “residues” to outline how continuing historical material, legislative, and social legacies structure contemporary daily life and health outcomes in the neighborhood. In so doing, Lesser creates a dialogue between the past and the present, showing how the relationship between culture and disease is both layered and interconnected.
