Sommario/riassunto	This book explores the architecture and impact of United Nations peacekeeping missions, focusing on their material presence in impoverished regions. It delves into the intersection of architecture, international relations, and activism, examining how design can influence policies and empower communities. The author investigates the legitimacy and legacy of UN missions, highlighting the entanglement of financial, political, social, and cultural mechanisms in spatial production. The work challenges traditional architectural roles, positioning design as a tool for advocacy and change. It is intended for academics, policymakers, and activists interested in the socio-political dimensions of peacekeeping and global governance.
