Sommario/riassunto	Physiologist Scott Turner argues eloquently that the apparent design we see in the living world only makes sense when we add to Darwin's towering achievement the dimension that much modern molecular biology has left on the gene-splicing floor: the dynamic interaction between living organisms and their environment. Only when we add environmental physiology to natural selection can we begin to understand the beautiful fit between the form life takes and the way life works.

Sommario/riassunto	This book, authored by Walter Bucerius, explores the economic and social developments in the city of Remscheid. Published in 1909, it examines the city's industrial progress and municipal activities, focusing on public enterprises such as gas and waterworks, and other urban facilities like slaughterhouses and public baths. The text provides insights into the challenges faced by Remscheid, including resource scarcity and infrastructural demands due to its geographical position. It also delves into the economic structure, highlighting small to medium enterprises and their global trade relations. The book is intended for readers interested in urban economics and industrial history, particularly in the context of early 20th-century Germany.
