Sommario/riassunto

This volume focuses on the role of informal networks in shaping foreign relations during the Early Modern period, specifically through the lens of patronage and personal connections. Edited by Hillard von Thiessen and Christian Windler, it compiles revised and expanded versions of presentations from the 45th German Historians' Conference. The book examines how personal relationships and patronage influenced political dynamics in various European monarchies, such as the Papal States, Poland-Lithuania, and the Holy Roman Empire. It explores how trust was established across distances and the competitive patronage among foreign powers in elective monarchies. The work is intended for scholars of early modern history, emphasizing a comparative European perspective and the importance of micro-politics in diplomatic relations.
