Sommario/riassunto	This volume explores the evolution of Spanish university law faculties and academic structures between 1940 and 1983, focusing on the transition from traditional cátedra-based systems to departmental models. It examines socio-political changes during Franco's dictatorship and their impact on the roles and classifications of professors, including catedráticos, agregados, and adjuntos. The book also highlights the challenges faced in compiling biographical dictionaries of law professors due to shifts in administrative records and the emergence of new universities and faculties. This work is part of the Legal History Programme at the Figuerola Institute, aiming to deepen understanding of the historical development of legal education in Spain and its broader academic implications. It is intended for scholars, historians, and legal academics interested in Spanish legal history and university structures.
