Sommario/riassunto

This book explores the multifaceted challenges and dynamics of urbanization in China, focusing on institutional, policy, and economic factors. It examines topics such as land financing, property rights reforms, and the political economy of public services including education and housing. The book provides a comparative analysis of spatial growth between China, India, and the United States, and discusses the impact of urbanization on food security and social services. Edited by Karen Eggleston, Jean C. Oi, and Yiming Wang, it aims to provide insights into China's urban development for policymakers, scholars, and students interested in urban studies and Chinese economic policies.
