

1. Record Nr.	UNISA996384340603316
Titolo	Two-penny-worth of wit for a penny. Or, The bad husband turn'd thrifty [[electronic resource]] : this man that wrought his own decay, and spent his money night and day; is turn'd to saving I do swear, there's few that with him can compare: and Ives so civil in his ways, that all his neighbours give him praise, and does repent his wicked crime, and desires good fellows to turn in time; there's many a man runs himself clear out, when ale's in his head, then wit is out. To the tune of, Packingtons pound
Pubbl/distr/stampa	[London], : Printed for J. Deacon, at the Angel in Giltspur-street., [1685?]
Descrizione fisica	1 sheet ([1] p.) : ill. (woodcuts)
Soggetti	Ballads, English - 17th century Drinking customs in literature Compulsive behavior Broadsides 17th century. England
Lingua di pubblicazione	Inglese
Formato	Materiale a stampa
Livello bibliografico	Monografia
Note generali	Place and date of publication suggested by Wing. Verse: "All company-keepers come hear what I say ..." Two settings for the British Library. At A5:2 the final word of the first line is 'wit'; the 'y' in 'penny' is under the 'o' of 'worth'; the text is in 3 columns, with 3 woodcuts above the first 2. The setting at A6:2 differs in print size and title setting from A5:2. Cf. Wing. Trimmed; item at A6:2 also stained. Reproduction of original in the British Library.
Sommario/riassunto	eebo-0018